

London

The article's topic is London - the capital of Great Britain and why this city is a great place to visit.

The author introduces the subject by first giving a brief overview of London's formation history. Namely, Roman invaders founded London after they had found a place narrow enough to build a bridge across the Thames river. Thereupon, the city began prospering as one of the busiest waterways in the world.

Next, the writer provides the classification of different parts of London and what features they possess. The author mentioned four primary parts of London: East and West Ends, City, and Westminster. The East End is the poorest part of London, with the highest percentage of unemployed people, poor architecture with no exciting places to visit. The West End is, in contrast, a charming, appealing, very bright part of the city with loads of various cinemas, theatres, concert halls, famous shops with spacious streets and avenues, and shining parks.

The writer proceeds by switching to The City and Westminster's description. The city is small yet one of the most vital London parts as it is its business and financial center with numerous banks and offices. Westminster is the administrative center of London, where the Houses of Parliament are situated.

In the subsequent paragraphs, the author elaborates on various places one can visit in London: Buckingham Palace, Piccadilly Circus, Trafalgar Square, The London Eye, and many others.

Let us draw a conclusion. My impression after the passage is that London is an outstanding, exceptional place to visit, with thousands of different places with unique and thrilling backgrounds and indescribable charm.
